

Clean Energy For The Slums Of Johannesburg

South Africa's most populous city is attracting more and more people on the search for work and a better life. Most of the migrants find housing in derelict buildings and slum-like settlements without electricity. How to provide these people with clean and affordable energy is the aim of the German-South African "EnerKey" research project.

Read more: <http://www.dw.de/program/tomorrow-today>